Fermentation is a process for an end result.

This is a natural process of controlled fermentation, as a result of which microorganisms and their enzymes (yeast and bacteria) break down the organic substances of the product itself.

During the fermentation process, products are enriched with nutrients, organic acids, vitamins B, K, PP, probiotics and enzymes. And carbohydrates, such as starch and sugar, included in the product are converted into alcohol or acid.

It is these natural preservatives that prevent the product from spoiling.

Allergy

This is a failure of the immune response, which is caused by the coincidence of several factors: internal intoxication, unstable nervous system + poor nutrition and disturbed intestinal microflora.

Start with detoxification and microflora reboot

The ability to resist allergens largely depends on the state of the gastrointestinal tract and intestinal microflora. Poor digestion leads to fermentation processes and rotting food. As a result, the barrier function of the intestinal mucosa is disrupted, the condition of which determines the penetration of allergens into the body, and the balance of intestinal microflora, which removes toxins and helps build and maintain the immune system, which helps prevent allergic conditions. These violations make it possible the development of numerous diseases, including those of an allergic nature.

Therefore, you need to start eliminating allergies with deep detoxification at the level of the intestines, liver, blood and rebooting the microflora.
